Topic: Banning Zoos

Ladies and gentlemen,

Today we gather, not just as individuals, but as stewards of this planet, as voices for the voiceless, and as advocates for a future where compassion triumphs over captivity. As we stand before the concept of zoos, we find ourselves at a pivotal moment in our evolution as a society. It is time to confront the profound moral dilemma that has lurked in the shadows for far too long: the continued existence of zoos and the implications they carry for the magnificent creatures they house.

Sure, here is the revised version of your text:

Imagine, for a moment, the majestic tiger - an emblem of strength and grace - prowling through the vibrant jungles of its homeland. Picture the subtle intelligence of the dolphin, gliding through the sun-drenched waves, free to explore the ocean's depths. These animals, born to roam vast landscapes and swim in limitless waters, are denied their very essence. Instead of roaming the wild as they are meant to, they are confined to enclosures that cannot replicate their natural habitats.

Is it right, I ask you, to confine these extraordinary beings to cages for our curiosity? To commodify their existence for our entertainment? We must confront the unsettling fact that while zoos tout their role in education and conservation, they often fall short. Our world is not a classroom for gawping at animals through glass and bars; it is a home for fostering understanding and preserving the delicate balance of ecosystems.

The statistics are unsettling. Over half of the world's wild animal species are in decline, driven to the brink by habitat loss, poaching, and climate change. And while there are efforts within zoos to approach conservation, let us not forget that true conservation lies in protecting animals in their natural habitats, not by extracting them for display.

Let us not forget the emotional distress suffered by these animals. The renowned zoologist, John Cartwright, once stated, "Animals develop behavioural issues due to the stress and confinement of their enclosures, showing signs of depression and despair— behaviours that we, as compassionate beings, should find appalling." It's truly despicable. These creatures are sentient beings, capable of experiencing pain and joy, longing for connections and freedom. Should our selfish fascination come at the expense of their well-being?

Banning zoos is not just a dream. It is a necessity.

By banning zoos, we embrace a future that prioritises the welfare of all living beings over the trivial pleasures of watching them perform unnatural acts.

Together, we can create a world where compassion, understanding, and respect for the natural world guide our choices, ensuring a better life for innocent animals. Let us stand together, united in our conviction to end the practice of keeping animals in captivity for our fleeting amusement. Let's unite to end imprisoning animals in captivity for our entertainment. Let's work towards a world where freedom is the standard, where we protect their habitats, celebrate biodiversity, and act as their guardians rather than mere spectators of their lives.

Join us in the vital call to action. Let's work towards a more compassionate world by banning zoos, for the animals, for ourselves, and for generations to come. Thank you.

The Longest Day: A Student's Struggle with Extended School Hours

The relentless bell echoes through the empty halls, signalling the end of another marathon school day. The clock reads 4:00 p.m., but my body feels like it's midnight. Long school hours have become a haunting reality for us students, transforming our days into a ceaseless cycle of exhaustion and stress.

I remember when the school day used to end at 3:00 p.m. Back then, afternoons were a time to breathe, to be free, and to explore our interests outside of the school's four walls. But now, those precious hours are devoured by endless lessons and mounting homework. As I trudge through the hallways, my backpack weighs heavily on my shoulders, filled with textbooks, notebooks, and the burden of sleepless nights.

A Plea for Balance

We are more than just students; we are sons, daughters, brothers, and sisters. We need time to grow, to explore our passions, and to connect with our loved ones. The pressure to succeed in school is immense, but at what cost? Our mental health, our relationships, and our childhood are all at stake.

As I walk home under the darkening sky, I can't help but wonder if this is how it's supposed to be. Is this what education is meant to look like? The school bell rings again in my mind, a constant reminder of the cycle that awaits me tomorrow. But I hold onto hope that one day, the bell will signal not just the end of a long day, but the beginning of a brighter, more balanced future for all of us.

I look around and see my friends slumped over their desks, some fighting to stay awake, others staring blankly at the board. It's heartbreaking to see their spark dimmed by the endless hours. Teachers do their best to engage us, but even their passion is no match for the exhaustion that grips us all. The creativity and curiosity that once thrived in our classrooms have been replaced by a numb compliance

The Impact on Family Life

Outside the school gates, the impact of these extended hours ripples through our families. I see the worry in my parents' eyes as they notice the dark circles under mine. Our dinner conversations, once filled with laughter and stories, have been replaced by silence as I struggle to keep my eyes open. The time we used to spend together, bonding and sharing our lives, is now swallowed by the demands of schoolwork.

My little sister waits for me to come home so we can play in the backyard, but by the time I get there, the sun is already setting, and the day has slipped away. I can see the disappointment in her eyes, and it breaks my heart. How many more moments like these will I miss because of the relentless push for academic achievement?
